F.B.I.HQSerology of parasitic infections in Gambian children with sickle-cell disease. An attempt was made to determine the serological responses to parasitic infections in children with sickle-cell disease in The Gambia where the two main causative organisms are Plasmodium falciparum and Strongyloides stercoralis. The results of indirect immunofluorescence and immune adherence haemagglutination for different parasites are shown in tables and graphs. The antibody concentrations were measured by their mean log2 dilutions. There were significant differences in the level of antibody to the different parasites in both IgG and IgM isotypes. This was not the case in the control group of children without a known past history of parasitic infection. The serum from the sickle-cell disease patients was collected at a time when they were free from any clinical manifestations of these infections. The antibody responses in each case reflected the background exposure to the respective parasites in The Gambia and therefore provided valuable baseline data for the control groups. The results indicate that young Gambians are exposed to malaria and that there is a low level of clinical disease at the time of the study. They also indicate that children with sickle-cell disease have a low level of exposure to P. falcipar
